EMERGENCY SERVICES

While outside emergency support is often slow to come in Native communities, our Southwest Reservation Aid (SWRA) program helps facilitate disaster planning, readiness and response strategies with tribes.

Recently, SWRA facilitated First Aid, CPR and AED training for 19 citizens of the White Mountain Apache Tribe in Cibecue, AZ. The participants learned a range of first-aid scenarios and techniques, shared personal experiences and put their new skills to the test. With 19 more tribal members now certified, trainer Lauri shared her passion for the cause: "I just love the teaching part of it; seeing those lights go on in their heads – especially for the kids."

Native students face educational barriers, from funding to the digital divide and racial prejudice. 48-year-old Donna of the Oglala Sioux Tribe is about to graduate college after a challenging journey.

After raising a family of four as a single mother and surviving two brain tumors, she's ready to complete her associate's degree in criminal justice. We awarded her a vocational scholarship through our American Indian Education Fund (AIEF) program to help her complete her last semester.

NOTE FROM PWNA PRESIDENT & CEO

Look around — Native culture is everywhere. The land you walk on, the food you eat, the medicines we use, and the language and words we speak. Native American culture has and continues to influence the American way of life. But, there are plenty who are not yet #NativeAware®— and we need your help to change this!

GRANT UPDATE

The White Mountain Apache Tribe (WMAT) in Arizona has been busy with emergency preparedness and disaster response training for more than 80 participants, year-to-date! Just this month, WMAT tribe members and leaders have received direct training in 1st Aid & CPR (adult and pediatric), Certified Emergency Response Team, and Active Shooter Preparedness. These much-needed capacity-building training sessions are funded by generous grants to PWNA from Boeing, Freeport McMoRan, and the Levi Strauss Foundation.
